Panama Canal

The Panama Canal is an important shipping route. This artificial waterway is located in Panama, a country in Central America. On one side of Panama is the Caribbean Sea; the Pacific Ocean flanks the other side. The Canal runs through the narrowest part of the Isthmus of Panama. The Canal allows ships to pass from the east to the west coasts of the United States and vice versa without having to go round South America. This shortens the voyage by 8000 nautical miles and ships no longer have to sail through the dangerous and stormy Cape Horn.

A huge dam was built across River Chagres, creating an artificial lake known as Lake Gatun. The Canal flows through the Gatun Locks to the dam which lies to the east of Lake Gatun. The Panama Canal is 81.6 km long. The minimum width of the Canal is about 91 m and its minimum depth is about 12 m. Through this Canal, ships can travel from the Atlantic Ocean via the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean. The ships actually have to travel upstream and downstream in the Canal. This is done by way of locks. There are twelve locks in the canal. All the locks are doubled so that ships can pass through in both directions. The water level in the locks have to be raised or lowered appropriately to allow a ship to sail on. The raising or lowering of the water level in the locks is a time-consuming process. A ship will take between eight to nine hours to cross the Panama Canal.

The Panama Canal has been open since 1914. Since then, the shipping industry has expanded by leaps and bounds. It has also brought the world closer together. The existence of the Panama Canal has great political and commercial importance to the United States. This has given the United States an edge when trading with countries in the southern hemisphere of the world and with the far eastern countries. Routes to the British Isles and Europe from the western part of the United States have been made faster. Countries located in the Pacific Ocean are thus more closely connected with their manufacturing centers in Europe. The Panama Canal has also brought the ports in Southeast Asia nearer to the Atlantic ports of North America.

Lately however, the Panama Canal has not been able to cope with the ever-increasing demands of modern shipping. The depth of the water is not deep enough or certain parts of the waterway are not wide enough for most modern vessels to pass through. There are also too many Locks in the canal which cause unnecessary delay and slow down the ships. Due to these factors, proposals have been made to reconstruct the Canal. One proposal is to build two-way sea level canals across Costa Rica which will be underground. These canals will be tunneled through the mountain range, thus protecting the vessel from possible storms.

Over half of Indian users consume news on social media

A significant number of Indian audiences use social media apps such as YouTube (53%) and WhatsApp (51%) for accessing news, according to findings from a survey by Reuters Institute for the Study of Journalism. India is a strongly mobile-focused market, with 72% accessing news through smartphones and only 35% via computers. News aggregator platforms and apps such as Google News (53%), Daily Hunt (25%), InShorts (19%), and Newspoint (17%) have become an important way to access news and are valued for convenience. Further, the digital market saw an overall growth of 29% in 2021, with advertising and subscription revenues growing at 29% each. Other than YouTube and WhatsApp, Facebook (43%), Instagram (32%), Twitter (22%) and Telegram (21%) are important social media apps for news. Overall, 60% of consumers share news via social media, messaging or email. These data are based on a survey of mainly English-speaking, online news users in India — a small subset of a larger, more diverse, media market, the report says. Respondents are generally more affluent, younger, have higher levels of formal education, and are more likely to live in cities than the wider Indian population.

Online platforms remain the source of news for 84% of the respondents with social media accounting for 63% on its own, television remaining a choice for 59% and print for 49% of consumers. Other than smartphones and computers, 15% also access news via tablets, The popularity of social media is a concern for policy-makers as these platforms are also rife with misinformation, as well as incessant trolling and abuse, the report says. Legacy print brands and public broadcasters continue to enjoy high trust among the survey respondents, while 24-hour television news channels are less well trusted — along with newer digital-born brands, the report says.
